A Literary Legacy

Riverside and Bridgehampton have played a pivotal role in the literary history of Ontario. In the 19th century, the area was home to a thriving community of writers, artists, and intellectuals. Among them was Susanna Moodie, a Scottish immigrant who chronicled her experiences in the Canadian wilderness in her seminal work, "Roughing It in the Bush." Her vivid descriptions of the region's rugged beauty and the challenges of pioneer life continue to resonate with readers today.

In the early 20th century, Riverside became a popular summer destination for Toronto's literary elite. Writers such as Ernest Hemingway, F. Hemingway, in particular, was drawn to the local fishing and hunting opportunities, which he immortalized in his short stories and novels.

Margaret Atwood's novel, "Surfacing," the river becomes a symbol of the protagonist's inner turmoil and her search for identity.

The townspeople of Riverside and Bridgehampton have also left their mark on literature. In Alice Munro's short story, "The View from Castle Rock," a local woman named Flo reveals the secrets of her past and the bittersweet memories that haunt her.
