Often the process takes several appointments and may involve several different kinds of tests designed to understand the underlying features of a condition.

Four essential components of psychological assessment:

Norm-referenced tests: The tests that psychologists use are norm-referenced which means that they were designed and calibrated based upon data collected from a wide variety of individuals and are therefore less likely to produce bias results. There are several different kinds of tests that all assess a different element of mental health and cognitive functioning. When the results are viewed collectively, holistic recommendations can be made to help the client improve overall functioning.
